From the mountains of Kentucky he wrested a princely fortune, but in the doing he never overlooked his friends and carried many of them to weakh with him. Thomas Mayo of Johnson county, a country school teacher, was recognized by his neighbors for character and knowledge rather than for shrewdness, but few men have realized greater returns on a small investment than his many years ago when he mortgaged his little mountain homestead and staked it and all his small savings on the education of his son, John C. Thomas Mayo was determined his son should have an education. So was his son, who taught school and stinted himself that his wages might be used to pay
